PLAINTIFFS' FIFTH REPORT TO COURT AND MONITOR ON STOP AND FRISK PRACTICES

I. Introduction

A. The Current State of Non-Compliance with the Consent Decree

This Fifth Report to the Court and Monitor presents compelling evidence that nearly four years after the entry of the Consent Decree the City has failed to adequately remedy the serious flaws that existed (and continue to exist) in the Police Department's stop and frisk practices. The Consent Decree was intended to ensure that stops and frisks are conducted only where there is the requisite "reasonable suspicion" of criminal conduct and to ensure that any racial disparities in stops and frisks are not the result of racial bias. On the issue of whether stops and frisks are supported by reasonable suspicion, the data shows very high levels of impermissible stops. And, on the issue of whether impermissible racial factors are causing high numbers of racial minorities to be stopped and frisked, consideration of the "benchmarks" for assessing possible racial bias demonstrates that non-racial factors do not explain the racial disparities. As we discuss below, there is an urgent need for substantial improvements on both issues, and if that is not accomplished in the near future, we will seek court intervention.

B. Procedural History

On June 21, 2011, the Court approved a Settlement Agreement, Class Certification, and Consent Decree (“Agreement”) in this matter. On February 6, 2012, plaintiffs submitted their First Report which analyzed stop and frisk data for the first two quarters of 2011. The First Report focused on Fourth Amendment issues, and specifically whether there was sufficient cause for the stops and frisks reported by the Philadelphia Police Department (“PPD”). The audits showed that over 50% of stops and frisks were undertaken without reasonable suspicion.

Plaintiffs’ Second Report was submitted in July 2012, and included (1) a Fourth Amendment analysis of the Third Quarter 2011 stop and frisk data, (2) a racial analysis of the data for the First and Second Quarters, 2011, and (3) a racial analysis of arrests for possession of small amounts of marijuana for the period September 15-November 15, 2011. Plaintiffs reported continued high rates of stops and frisks without reasonable suspicion (over 40% in both categories). On the question of racial disparities, plaintiffs’ expert, Professor David Abrams, considered the benchmarks that had been agreed upon by the parties as metrics that should be used in this analysis. Professor Abrams also conducted a series of regression analyses and concluded that the racial disparities in stops and frisks (numbers by race compared to census data) were not fully explainable by non-racial factors. Further, the analysis of marijuana arrests showed even more pronounced disparities, with Blacks and Latinos constituting over 90% of all marijuana arrests.

Plaintiffs’ Third Report focused on stop and frisk practices for the first two quarters of 2012 and analyzed marijuana arrests for the period September 15-November 15, 2012. Plaintiffs again found a rate of non-compliance with Fourth Amendment standards of over 40%, and racial minorities constituting over 90% of arrests for small amounts of marijuana. In response, the City stated that the PPD was providing additional training, issuing revised auditing protocols, and instituting new accountability measures.

The Fourth Report, filed in December, 2013, analyzed stops and frisks in 2012 and 2013, on both Fourth and Fourteenth Amendment grounds. We found that pedestrian stops were made without reasonable suspicion in 43% of the cases reviewed, and frisks were conducted without reasonable suspicion in over 50% of the cases. There continued to be very low “hit-rates,” with only 3 guns recovered in over 1100 stops (0.27%). Overall, contraband of any kind was recovered in only 3% of the stops. We also noted the relatively low number of frisks reported, with only 20% of stops resulting in frisks, and numerous stops based on allegations of violent crime or weapon possession, where no frisk was conducted.

The stops and frisks continued to be racially disproportionate with statistically significant racial disparities that were not explained by non-racial factors (e.g., crime rates, demographics of police districts, age, and gender). The rate of stops without reasonable suspicion for Blacks was 6.5 percentage points higher than the rate for Whites, indicating that police were using a higher threshold of “reasonable suspicion” for stops of White suspects.

Thus, by the close of 2013, two and one-half years after the entry of the Consent Decree in this case, there continued to be very high rates of stops and frisks without reasonable suspicion and sufficient evidence to conclude that the racially disproportionate rates of stops and frisks was not explainable by non-racial factors.

Plaintiffs stated that the time for court intervention was drawing closer:

Plaintiffs did not expect that the transition from a stop and frisk practice that lacked any meaningful oversight to a system that accurately tabulates all stops and frisks and in which there is substantial compliance with the Constitution would be immediately successful. On the technology front, the initial design of the data base was flawed, but the City is moving to implement a new system. On the issue of whether stops and frisks are being conducted consistent with established legal standards, and in particular only where reasonable suspicion supports the stop or frisk, the results of our audits through the first two quarters of 2012 reflect persistent and unacceptably high rates of improper actions. Unless there is a dramatic change in practices, we will be compelled to seek judicial relief. Third Report, at 11.

Plaintiffs also stated that with the new electronic data system on-line in 2014 and new audit and accountability measures in place, we expected significant improvements in 2014 and, failing such progress, that we would seek sanctions from the Court. Fourth Report, at 9.<sup>1</sup>

On the Fourth Amendment issue, the City's Response included an internal audit that showed a 35% rate of pedestrian stops without reasonable suspicion by patrol officers. The City asserted that the high rates of stops without reasonable suspicion were the result of "incomplete paperwork, improper narratives used by police officers, and an overall lack of credibility in the electronic data base." City Reply, at 1. Further, the City asserted that these problems would be rectified once the new electronic data base was implemented, training of officers was completed, and better auditing procedures were instituted.

On the Fourteenth Amendment issue, the City's expert, Dr. Ralph Taylor of Temple University, using certain benchmarks that differed from those agreed upon by the parties, found no statistically significant evidence of racial bias. To ensure that the experts were in accord on the proper benchmarks, the parties met and conferred with the Court Monitor, Dean Joanne Epps. Professor Abrams thereafter drafted a slightly revised set of benchmarks which is the basis of his analysis in this Fifth Report.

We turn now to our analysis of the first two quarters, 2014.

C. The Data Review Process

Plaintiffs have established a careful and comprehensive review process of the stop and frisk data provided by the Police Department. Each quarter, we are provided data from approximately 3200 randomly selected pedestrian and car stops, but for our review we consider only pedestrian stops. Counsel for plaintiffs and trained law students independently review each pedestrian stop and frisk under guidelines that incorporate the standards set forth in the Agreement and by the United States and Pennsylvania Supreme Courts.<sup>2</sup> We accept at face value the reasons stated by police officers for the stops and frisks, and make assessments based solely on whether these reasons comport with standards established by the Agreement and the Fourth Amendment. In close cases, we credit the stated basis for the stop and frisk.

Counsel for plaintiffs have discussed the appropriate Fourth Amendment standards with Inspectors in the PPD. Along the same lines, plaintiffs have provided the City a breakdown of the categories of stops and frisks that have most frequently resulted in improper police interventions. The City has made changes in the PPD audit process, including the assignment of Deputy Commissioner Nola Joyce to oversee the implementation of the Agreement, the assignment of trained Inspectors to ensure more accurate reviews, and reviews by the PPD Office of Standards and Accountability.

II. Review of 75-48a Forms, First Two Quarters, 2014

A. Fourth Amendment Analysis

In this section, plaintiffs set forth their findings on the issue of whether stops and frisks for the first two quarters of 2014 were supported by the requisite reasonable suspicion. As in previous audits, in assessing whether reasonable suspicion existed for the stop or frisk, we fully credited the narrative information provided by the officer and in “close” cases credited the assertion of reasonable suspicion.<sup>3</sup>

For the first two quarters of 2014, the PPD provided a random sample of 2974 pedestrian stops. We determined that 2519 of these stops were actual pedestrian stops (as opposed to arrests, car related stops, or contacts with civilians that did not constitute a Terry stop). We also excluded stops at the airport as those stops (few in number) could not be analyzed for racial disparities given the unknown racial demographics of airport travelers and visitors. Of these 2519 pedestrian stops, 63% were supported by reasonable suspicion and 37% were made without reasonable suspicion (and the same ratios were found even including the few airport stops excluded from our analysis). Frisks were reported in 589 stops, but 156 were searches and not frisks (often, searches incident to arrest), thus leaving 433 actual frisks. Of these, 47% were made with reasonable suspicion, 39% were made without reasonable suspicion, and 14% were preceded by a

<sup>3</sup> With respect to frisks, we have created a third category for situations where the stop was impermissible, but the reasons for the frisk were otherwise proper. In these cases, we record the frisk as “the fruit of the poisonous tree.” Under this doctrine, the evidence that was seized would likely be suppressed in a criminal prosecution due to the improper stop.

stop without reasonable suspicion (“fruit of the poisonous tree” category). By race, 80% of the stops were of minorities (African-Americans and Latinos) and 89% of the frisks were of minorities.

B. Commentary on Fourth Amendment Issues

There are a number of significant findings from the data review.

1. We have determined that 37% of all stops were made without the requisite reasonable suspicion. Significantly, the PPD audits show similar rates of stops without reasonable suspicion: the audits for the first two quarters of 2014 by the PPD show patrol officer stops without reasonable suspicion at 39% and 29%, respectively. The data show only very modest improvement from the previous data reviews (where impermissible stops were at 40-50%) and, in light of the over 200,000 pedestrian stops for 2014, tens of thousands of persons in Philadelphia continue to be stopped each year without reasonable suspicion. Thus, close to four years from the entry of the Settlement Agreement in this case, the City has clearly failed to achieve substantial compliance with the provisions requiring reasonable suspicion for stops of pedestrians.

2. We have also found that 39% of all frisks were made without reasonable suspicion and an additional 14% were made in cases where the stop itself was not supported by reasonable suspicion (“fruit of the poisonous tree”). The PPD audits for this period show much lower rates of frisks without reasonable suspicion (5% and 3%, respectively, for the first two quarters of 2014).

Given the large discrepancies in this data analysis, to demonstrate the validity of our findings, we attach a spread-sheet of the relevant data for frisks for these two quarters. See Exhibit A. The spread-sheet includes the D.C. number, the reasons for the stop and the frisk, and our findings on the legality of the frisks (y=with reasonable suspicion; n=without reasonable suspicion; x=a search and not a frisk; f=fruit of the poisonous tree). This data and analysis shows that the City has not achieved substantial compliance with the provisions of the Settlement Agreement that require reasonable suspicion that a suspect be armed and dangerous as a basis for a frisk.

3. As with the data for 2011-2013, the number of reported frisks is quite low, with only 17% of stops recording a frisk (and an additional 6% resulting in a search). To be clear, we do not suggest that the police should conduct frisks where there are no legal grounds for such action. But we do strongly believe that officers have not been reporting all frisks. For example, in stops based on suspicion of gun possession or a violent crime, the police frequently report no frisk of the suspect. Of the 211 stops in which guns or gun-related activity are referenced as a basis for the stop, there were no frisks recorded on 80 stops, or 38% of the total. It is simply not plausible to suggest that frisks are not being conducted in these situations.

4. The very low “hit-rate” of stops and frisks is further cause for serious concern. Contraband of any kind was recovered in only 58 stops (2.5 % of all stops) and 5 guns were seized (0.2 % of all stops), but 3 of these seizures were the result of searches, not frisks. Arrests occurred in 7.5% of all stops, excluding arrests made on probable cause even before a stop or frisk was conducted. These hit-rates continue to be far below what one would expect if stops and frisks were being conducted with reasonable suspicion. We recognize that some legitimate stops are not likely to disclose contraband or lead to an arrest and given the high rate of stops and frisks without reasonable suspicion, it is not surprising that contraband is infrequently recovered in those incidents.

The best metric for determining whether these police interventions are justified is one that determines the hit-rate for frisks, and whether weapons (or other contraband) are seized. Police officers must have reasonable suspicion that the suspect is armed and dangerous before a frisk can be conducted. Thus, we would expect that seizure of weapons or other contraband would be made in a significant number of these cases if the officers are accurately reporting facts that establish reasonable suspicion. Yet, the rate of recovery is vanishingly small. Overall, of 433 frisks, only 2 firearms were seized and contraband other than weapons was seized in only 19 other frisks. Thus, in over 95% of all frisks, no evidence was seized. And the real number is likely even higher given the fact that police reported no frisks in 80 stops involving violent crimes or reports of weapons. And even more telling, if we limit our analysis to cases in where police reported that the suspect was armed or involved in a violent crime, a weapon was seized in a frisk in only 2 cases.

Moreover, the data raise serious questions regarding the justifications for many frisks. Most frisk reports assert that the suspect has a “bulge” in a pocket, refuses to take his hands out of his pockets, does not cooperate with police, or that the stop was based on a report of a gun or violent crime. “Bulges” inevitably turn out to be cell phones and the other triggering factors are very weak indicators of criminal activity. Thus, in 78 cases in which police conducted a frisk based on a “bulge,” a weapon was detected in only 1 case. The fact that so few frisks lead to the recovery of a weapon raises serious questions as to whether the police are accurately reporting what they observe and whether the reasons generally provided for frisks are appropriate proxies for weapon possession.

5. Reduction in the number of stops and frisks (and particularly those conducted without reasonable suspicion) does not create a risk to public safety. For example, New York City has reported a huge reduction in the number of stops and a decrease in violent crime, and in particular homicides. New York City reported 700,000 stops per year in 2011, but was on target for approximately 50,000 stops in 2014. See Washington Post, December 3, 2014. By contrast, in a City with a population one-fifth that of New York City, Philadelphia police made over 200,000 pedestrian stops in 2014. In 2009, a year before this case was filed, there were 253,000 pedestrian stops.

6. Analyzing improper stops and frisks by category, the results were quite similar to those for 2013. As we have reported to the City, there continue to be significant numbers of stops for conduct which the Agreement and case law make clear are not justifiable grounds for stops or frisks. These include:

- loitering (or persons hanging out; congregating)<sup>4</sup>
- investigation of passenger in stopped car
- person involved in a disturbance
- single person “obstructing” the sidewalk
- anonymous information (e.g., man with gun; man with drugs)
- person on steps of or near “abandoned” property
- person involved in verbal dispute (non-domestic)<sup>5</sup>
- high crime area/roll call complaints
- panhandling
- suspicion of narcotics activity

As for frisks, problematic grounds include:

- frisk for officer protection

<sup>4</sup> The PPD has instructed officers that “loitering” is not a valid basis for a stop. And while the number of such stops has decreased, the PPD has recognized that officers are using other vague narratives (e.g., blocking buildings) to justify stops. PPD, September 6, 2013 Audit.

<sup>5</sup> We credit reports of “domestic” disputes.

- frisk based on narcotics investigation
- frisk because suspect stopped in high crime or high drug area

Moreover, as discussed above, given the extraordinarily low rate of recovery of weapons or any contraband in frisk cases, there is good reason to believe that none of the factors cited as establishing reasonable suspicion are good indicators of a person in possession of a weapon.

7. We provide a more detailed analysis of racial disproportionality in the next section, but as the stop and frisk data presented above shows, there is evidence of disproportionate stops and frisks of minorities not explainable by factors other than race. For example, in examining the differences by race of stops with and without reasonable suspicion, White suspects are being stopped less frequently than minorities where no reasonable suspicion is stated, indicating that a higher factual threshold is being applied for stops of White suspects.

8. Although the reasons for the continued high rates of impermissible stops and frisks are likely the result of several factors, we believe that the primary cause at this point is the lack of accountability of officers and their immediate supervisors. There is substantial agreement between the parties that the rate of stops without reasonable suspicion continues to exceed 30% and plaintiffs' analysis shows that the rate of frisks without reasonable suspicion is even higher. The City reports that the PPD has retrained all officers and has provided specific instructions to officers as to the proper grounds for stops and frisks. In these circumstances, the failure of the PPD to hold officers accountable is unacceptable. We have requested notice of any new accountability measures, but there has been no response by the City on this front. Without strong accountability measures, the high level of violations of constitutional rights will likely continue.

III. Racial Analysis of Stop and Frisk Practices, January-June, 2014

A. Introduction

This section sets forth a statistical analysis of the “Stop and Frisk” practices of the PPD for the first half of 2014, conducted by plaintiffs’ expert, Professor David Abrams. The benchmarks to be used in the analysis were described in detail in a Memorandum dated November 9, 2011 and updated in 2014. See Exhibit B.

In creating benchmarks to measure compliance of the PPD with the terms of the Agreement, we considered several criteria. First, the benchmarks are designed to be straightforward in terms of computation and interpretation. Second, they are designed to measure characteristics at the core of the Agreement, namely compliance with the Fourteenth Amendment. Third, they consider other potential explanations for patterns in the data beyond suspect race. The benchmarks are based on a combination of those discussed and used in NAACP v. City of Philadelphia, academic literature on the topic, and those used recently in other jurisdictions, as described in Plaintiffs’ Second Report.

In Floyd v. City of New York, 959 F.Supp. 2d 540 (S.D.N.Y. 2013), the court engaged in an intensive analysis of competing benchmarks submitted by the plaintiffs and the City in the New York City class action stop and frisk litigation. The court credited the approach of plaintiffs’ expert, Professor Jeffrey Fagan (Columbia Law School) who examined data on all stops in New York City from 2004 through 2009. Professor Fagan used a regression technique similar to that detailed in the benchmarks that have been adopted by the parties in Bailey. Professor Fagan considered the impact of the racial composition of a district on the likelihood of being stopped, arrested, or issued a citation. Additional outcomes included gun and other weapon seizures, and contraband seizures.

Professor Fagan controlled for various district characteristics, including age composition, racial composition, crime complaints, police patrol strength, socioeconomic status, population, foreign born population, business district status, and time controls. The benchmarks in this case, as reflected in this Report, use many of the benchmarks credited by the Floyd court.

B. Summary of the Racial Aspects of the Stop and Frisk Data

We examined data from Q1 and Q2 2014 pedestrian stops. The sample dataset includes 2,523 total pedestrian stops.<sup>6</sup> The median age of a detainee is 29 and 84% of detainees are male. Figure 1. Blacks account for 72% of those stopped, Whites comprise 20%, and 9% are Latinos. Compared to 2012, Black stop share has increased by 3 percentage points, while the White stop share has decreased by 3 percentage points.

Minorities account for an even higher share of individuals frisked, of which 79% are Black, 10% Latino and 11% White. The number of stops varies substantially by district, with the 25th, encompassing Hunting Park and other parts of North Philadelphia, accounting for the most, with 9%. See Figure 2. As in 2011 and 2012, the fewest stops are in the 5th police district which includes Roxborough, accounting for less than 1% of all stops.

Table 1 reports stop, frisk, and arrest rates for pedestrian stops broken down by race. Approximately 19% of stops of Black and Latino suspects lead to a frisk, considerably higher than the 10% rate for Whites.

<sup>6</sup> As in past reports, we are proceeding on a district-level analysis, rather than at the “sector” (“PSA”) level, due to the fact that not all of the control variables were made available at the PSA level. District level analysis should not materially impact the statistical analysis. We will move to PSA-level analysis as soon as all of the data is available at this level of aggregation.

Blacks and Latinos are also searched at a higher rate than Whites, 6.0% and 6.9%, respectively versus 4.1%, although the search rate of minorities dropped relative to 2012. It is possible that the increase in the frisk rate and decline in the search rate is due to anomalies in police reporting. We have attempted to identify cases in which police record a “frisk,” but which under the circumstances was clearly a search (e.g., incident to arrest), but that process is not perfect and is evolving with the implementation of the new electronic database.

The 2014 arrest rates were 6.0% for Blacks, 8.8% for Latinos, and 4.9% for Whites. However, as discussed in previous reports, plaintiffs and the City agree that arrest rates are not a good measure of the legality of stops and frisks since the decision to arrest is highly discretionary (e.g., where a person may be acting in a disorderly fashion, has an open liquor container, or is stopped on suspicion of curfew or truancy violations). Further, to determine whether the arrest rates are related to improper racial considerations, a more precise analysis of the reasons for the stops by race would be necessary.

C. Benchmark Applications

1. Stops, Census and Regression Analysis

The question of whether race is impermissibly used as a factor in the decision to stop and frisk cannot be answered by a simple comparison of stop and frisk rates to census data. Non-racial factors may explain the disparities. However, the stop rate/census comparison is the first step in this process. As set forth in Table 1, the stop rate by race in comparison to the census is as follows:

Black stops=72%; Black census=43.4%

White stops=20%; White census=41%

Latino stops=9%; Latino census=12.3%

The next step is a cross-district comparison of stop rates by Black/Minority population share. A racial disparity in stops should be expected based on differences in population composition. It is possible to examine variation in the share of Black and Latino stops by district, as reported in Tables 2A and 2B, respectively. Each row in the tables represents a district (column 1) and the tables are sorted by the Black or minority share of the population in the district, as reflected in column 2. The third column reports the share of stops that are of Black/minority pedestrians and the fourth is the ratio of Black/minority stops to Black/minority population share. Note that in all districts, Blacks and minorities account for a higher share of stops than they do in the population; in some districts, they are stopped at a rate over 5 times their share of the population. Thus, in the 7th Police District, where the population is 5% Black, 25% of the stops were of Blacks and in the 9th District where the population is 11% Black, 69% of the stops were of Blacks. By contrast, in the 22d Police District, where Blacks make up 89% of the population, the ratio of stops by race was close to a 1:1 ratio.

The last three columns report characteristics based on the census population of the district, not just minorities. The fifth column provides a measure of total stops to police officers (not including higher ranked officers) to measure how stop rates per officer vary across district by Black/minority population share. There is substantial variation across districts in the ratio of stops to officers. The correlation between average stops per officer and minority stop share is over 0.5, which means that districts where police officers make more stops also tend to stop a higher share of minorities. Of course, this is only a correlation and a more precise analysis is provided by the regression analysis set forth below.

The final two columns in Tables 2A and 2B report total stops per capita and the violent crime rate in the district (violent crimes per 1,000 residents). The correlation between stops per capita and the minority share of stops is also approximately 0.5 indicating that minorities constitute a higher fraction of those stopped in districts with a high stop rate. Again, regression analysis is necessary to determine whether the violent crime rates in these districts explains the extent of the differences.

To address non-racial influences, we next move to a multivariate regression analysis. This approach is more robust than a comparison of averages because it examines the relationship among multiple variables simultaneously. To determine the impact of suspect race on the likelihood of a stop or frisk, we controlled for factors that include the demographic makeup and crime rate of the neighborhood.

First, we add data collected from the U.S. Census as well as Uniform Crime Report data on reported crimes, by district. We begin by examining differences in overall stop rates by race in Table 3. This table (and tables 4, 7, 8 and 10) share the same format: each column in the table reports results from a separate regression that identifies the relationship between the variables listed in the first column and the dependent variable. For example, regression 2 can be written as:

$$(1) \quad StopRate = \alpha + \beta_1 Black + \beta_2 Hispanic + \beta_3 Age + \epsilon$$

Stop Rate is the number of stops in the sample examined per 10,000 residents in a district and Black is coded 0 if the detainee is White and 1 if the detainee is Black. Similarly, Hispanic is coded 1 if the detainee is Latino and zero otherwise. Age is the detainee's age in years. By including 3 variables in the equation, this regression can better isolate the impact of race and Latino identity on the likelihood of being stopped, even if age is an important factor in stop rate. The coefficient on Black found in column 2 is 11.31, which means that in the sample about 11.3 more Black individuals were stopped than White individuals for every 10,000 residents of a district. The standard errors are reported in parentheses below the coefficient and the double stars on the standard error indicates that this result is statistically significant at better than the 1% level. This means that there is less than a 1% chance that the difference in stop rates between Blacks and Whites is zero.

At first blush, 11.3 extra stops per 10,000 residents, out of more than 200,000 annual stops in Philadelphia, may not seem significant. The 2010 Census counted 1,526,006 residents of Philadelphia, so this would translate to a difference of 1,724 stops city-wide in the first two quarters of 2014. But these numbers are from the randomly selected sample of all stops. In order to determine the total difference we must adjust for the share of overall stops included in the sample. The total number of pedestrian stops in the first half of 2014 was approximately 107,000 and, therefore, the expected disparity in annual stops citywide is approximately 73,600 or 34% of the total annual stops.

There may be reasons other than race that minorities are stopped at higher rates. For example, if minorities tend to be younger on average, since more crime is committed by younger individuals, one might expect a higher stop rate for minorities. We controlled for this factor (as in equation 1 above) and others relevant to this issue. Column 2 in Table 3 controls for detainee age and adds Latino identity. Column 3 controls for the district racial composition as well as the share of the male population under 24 years of age. Even after adding these controls, the coefficient on Detainee Black (8.482) is still similar to what it was with no controls. The 4th column includes a control for whether flash information led to the stop, which does not have a statistically significant influence on the stop rate. Column 5 adds the district racial composition as well as employment rate to the regression. Since poor economic conditions are associated with higher crime, higher stop rates could be explained by low employment rates, but here the impact is not statistically significant.

The final four columns add different controls for district crime rates. The crime rates are based on crimes reported to the police (not arrests) in 2013. It is preferable to use lagged crime because current crime levels could be influenced by policing policies. In each case, districts with higher crime rates have more stops, but controlling for crime rates does not affect the influence of detainee race on stop rate.

Another potential explanation for higher stop rates of minorities is that they commit crimes at higher rates. Addressing this concern raises several challenges. First, we do not have accurate data as to crime rates by race. There is arrest data, but even if arrest data was an accurate measure of crime rates by race, an issue we discuss below, we would need this breakdown on a district by district (or sector by sector) basis to engage in the proper statistical analysis, and this information was not available.

Second, there is a methodological problem: arrest rates are not independent of stop rates; that is, they are not an unbiased measure of crime. Higher stop rates of one group will almost certainly lead to higher arrest rates. Thus, as we explained in Plaintiffs' Third and Fourth Reports to the Court, patterns of police enforcement have far more to say about the racial breakdown of persons arrested for drugs than actual drug use or possession by race. This is not to say that arrest rates are solely a function of enforcement, but that the measure is almost certainly a function of stop rates.

Third, there is a legal problem with using crime rates by race to explain disparities in stop rates: as a matter of Equal Protection doctrine, race is an impermissible factor to use when making stops, absent a racial description of a suspect. Thus, even if race-specific crime rates were available, it may not make sense to use them as controls in the regressions. See, Floyd v. City of New York, supra. Even in high crime areas, the commission of crimes is by relatively few persons and therefore it is problematic to justify higher rates of stops in these communities based on a kind of group-actuarial basis.

Table 4 is analogous to Table 3, but it reports the results of a regression of the rate of pedestrian frisks (rather than stops) on detainee race and various controls. In each regression, the coefficient on Detainee Black is statistically significantly different from zero and ranges from about 0.075 – 0.095. This regression shows that the frisk rate for Black detainees is 7.5– 9.5 percentage points higher than for Whites. Since the pedestrian frisk rate for Whites is 9.7%, this translates to an increased likelihood of 75% to almost 100% that Black detainees are frisked, relative to Whites. Including the control variables, such as age, district demographic variables, or crime rates, makes the result even more robust.

2. Reasonable Suspicion for Stops and Frisks: Racial Analysis

As the Plaintiffs' previous Reports and Section II of this Report demonstrate, a substantial number of the pedestrian stops do not meet the reasonable suspicion standard.

For the first six months of 2014, 37% of the stops were made without reasonable suspicion (see Table 5). While an improvement of 6 percentage points from 2013, this rate of stops without reasonable suspicion is unacceptably high. Further, while we found that the share of frisks without reasonable suspicion declined from 55% in 2012 to 52% in 2014 (see Table 6), that rate is also far too high.

To inform the Fourteenth Amendment analysis we considered whether the number of stops lacking reasonable suspicion varied by race or Latino identity. Table 5 shows significant variation by race in the share of stops lacking reasonable suspicion, which ranged from 32% for Whites to 39% for Blacks to 41% for Latinos. There is a 29% higher unfounded stop rate for Latinos and 21% higher for Blacks relative to Whites. The impact of detainee race on unfounded stop rates is explored in more detail below, by using regression analysis. There is also variation by race in unfounded frisk rates, see Table 6, with 50% of frisks of Blacks, 64% of Latinos and 60% of Whites lacking reasonable suspicion. However, regression analysis reveals that these differences are not statistically significant, largely due to the small sample size.

On the issue of race and reasonable suspicion for pedestrian stops, each column in Table 7 reports the results from a separate regression. In each regression the variable of interest is Detainee Black and various control variables are added in the different columns. In most of the columns the coefficient on Detainee Black is between -.05 and -.08 indicating that reasonable suspicion was found in 5 to 8 percentage points fewer cases when the detainee was black, and these differences are statistically significant. Thus, while the overall rate of unfounded stops is high for Whites at 32%, the unfounded rate is higher for Blacks, even when controlling for an array of potentially relevant characteristics. This means that the disparity in unfounded stops cannot be explained by differences in district demographics, crime rates, economic conditions, or other control variables, and thus strongly suggests that race is the underlying reason for the disparities.

Table 8 is similar to Table 7 and describes regressions about the rate of reasonable suspicion, but now for a frisk rather than a stop. The coefficient on Detainee Black ranges from about .06 to .09, but none of these coefficients are statistically significant. Overall there is little evidence that there are significant disparities in the rates of unfounded frisks, although this is largely due to the less precise estimates due to the smaller sample size. This holds true when examining Latino identity as well, where the results are statistically indistinguishable from Whites in this and the other regression analyses.

3. Hit-Rate Analysis

An important measure of the propriety of stops and particularly of frisks is the rate at which they lead to the discovery of contraband, and particularly weapons, since frisks are permitted only where the officer reasonably believes that the suspect is armed and dangerous. Moreover, seizures of weapons are often cited as justification for a robust stop and frisk program. The rates of discovery of contraband from frisks are reported in Table 9. Contraband is categorized as firearms, other weapons, drugs, or other. “Other” is not included in the table as it is a less significant event, consisting either of small amounts of cash or unspecified materials.

Table 9 reports an overall detection rate for firearms that is extremely low, with fewer than 1 in 200 pedestrian frisks yielding a firearm. There were a few other weapons discovered as well, but they raise the overall rate of detection of weapons to only 0.92%.

Table 9 reports results of a basic hit-rate analysis by race and Latino identity (with no control variables). None of the frisks of Whites in the sample yielded firearms and only 1 of the 47 frisks yielded other weapons. By comparison 0.58% of frisks of Blacks yielded firearms (a total of 2) and 0.29% yielded other weapons (1 other weapon).

Table 10 is a more sophisticated approach to the firearms hit-rate analysis. The regressions report the rate of discovery of a firearm in pedestrian frisks. None of the coefficients on Detainee Black or Detainee Hispanic are statistically significant, but this is likely due to the fact that firearms are very rarely discovered.

Drugs were detected in about 1 in 60 frisks. By racial category, drugs were discovered in 1.75% of frisks of Black pedestrians, 2.13% of Whites, and in no frisks of Latinos. Thus, there does not appear to be any evidence from frisk results to suggest that minorities possess drugs more frequently than Whites; indeed, the data points in the opposite direction. Further, although suspicion of drug activity may be grounds for a stop, a frisk may not be undertaken in a search for drugs and many of the “stops” for narcotics-related conduct that are recorded by police are actually arrests based on probable cause (e.g., observed drug transactions).

4. Marijuana Arrests

In previous Reports to the Court, plaintiffs have analyzed arrest data to determine whether there were racial disparities in cases involving small amounts of marijuana. The data from 2011, 2012 and 2013 were strikingly similar, showing that for these arrests, Blacks and Latinos accounted for over 90% of those charged. As we have previously asserted, these rates are not explainable by patterns of use or possession of marijuana as all reliable data shows that Blacks and Whites use and possess marijuana at approximately the same rate.

Philadelphia City Council recently found that “minorities are disproportionately impacted by the enforcement of marijuana laws, with African Americans 5.19 times more likely to be arrested for [possession of marijuana] in Philadelphia than Caucasians despite evidence showing nearly identical use across both communities.”<sup>1</sup> City Council enacted an Ordinance which provides that possession of under 30 grams of marijuana is to be treated as a Civil Code Violation punishable by a small fine and, in most circumstances, the offender is not subject to arrest and prosecution. Mayor Nutter signed the Ordinance, effective as of October 20, 2014. In light of this significant development, we have agreed with the City to postpone further review of the data on police enforcement of this Ordinance pending implementation of new protocols. The City will provide data on marijuana arrests and Civil Code Violations for the period February-April, 2015 and we will analyze the data in Plaintiffs’ Sixth Report.

5. Commentary

We have examined the relationship of race to stop and frisk practices from multiple perspectives, following standard statistical theories. It is significant that on the key benchmarks that provide the most reliable measures of racial bias—regression analysis, comparisons of stops without reasonable suspicion by race, and hit rate analysis—there is strong evidence that the large difference in stop and frisk rates by race in Philadelphia are not explained by non-racial factors. To the contrary, the data show statistically significant racial disparities that are not fully explainable by non-racial factors.

BENCHMARKS FOR BAILEY V. CITY OF PHILADELPHIA

I. Introduction

This Memorandum sets forth agreed upon benchmarks for evaluating the compliance of the Philadelphia Police Department (“PPD”) with the Settlement Agreement, Class Certification and Consent Decree (“Agreement”).

The Agreement provides for monitoring of the stop and frisk practices of the PPD to measure and ensure compliance with the terms of the Agreement. The parties agreed to a set of benchmarks in 2010 and plaintiffs have employed those benchmarks in assessing compliance in their four Reports to the Courts. In 2013, however, the City’s expert, Professor Ralph Taylor, took issue with certain findings by Plaintiffs’ expert, Professor David Abrams, and Professor Taylor employed some additional benchmarks in his analysis of the racial distribution of stops and frisks. Thereafter, the parties met and discussed these issues and as a result of further collaboration between the respective experts, some modifications in the Benchmark Memorandum have been made. These slightly modified benchmarks are intended to fairly measure and assess PPD compliance with the provisions of the Agreement under the Fourth and Fourteenth Amendments.

II. Background on Benchmarks

In NAACP v. City of Philadelphia, in 2002, plaintiffs submitted a report entitled Police Stops in Philadelphia: An Analysis of Racial Patterns, prepared by Professor Peter Jones assessing all stops made in a single week in September, 2000. The report includes a computation of the ratio of actual to expected number of stops by race based on the racial composition of the police district. This approach controlled for the fact that the pool of potential suspects in a particular area will depend in large part on who lives in that area. This ratio was reported separately for pedestrian and vehicle stops. Separating these two types of stops is sensible, as individuals who live in a district will make up a greater fraction of the pedestrian traffic than vehicular traffic.

The analysis also focuses on the population most likely to be stopped: younger males. For this group a comparison was made of the ratio of actual to expected stops by race, separately for pedestrian and vehicular stops. The report also examined stops and/or frisks made without reasonable suspicion by race, district, and arrest status.

Further analysis was performed by both the City and the plaintiffs of stops for the period November 23-29, 2003 to assess the racial distribution of the following: (1) vehicular stops, vehicular stops without reasonable suspicion, vehicular stops with frisks, vehicular stops yielding citations, vehicular stops leading to arrest, improper vehicular stops that led to frisks, vehicular stops that led to searches, and (2) pedestrian stops, pedestrian stops without reasonable suspicion, pedestrian frisks, pedestrian frisks without reasonable suspicion, pedestrian stops with searches, and pedestrian stops with searches without cause.

In January, 2011, the PPD prepared a report examining pedestrian stops in Philadelphia in 2009. This report focused on aggregate statistics for the entire City, but did not examine individual 75-48a forms in order to evaluate whether stops or frisks were justified. The report presented the racial composition of stops in Philadelphia relative to several potentially relevant comparison groups: the population of the city, arrestees, arrestees for violent crimes, and crime victims. It also included the outcomes of stops (frisk, arrest) by race; correlations between pedestrian stops and district characteristics; and correlations between minority population and district characteristics.

Professor Ian Ayres (Yale Law School) examined data on stops in Los Angeles between July 2003 and June 2004 for racial disparities. He presented results of regressions of various outcomes on suspect race, controlling for a variety of factors. The use of regression analysis has two distinct advantages over the comparisons made in the Philadelphia studies. It allows the analyst to control for multiple factors simultaneously and to determine whether differences are statistically significant. This is important, since sometimes even large disparities are not statistically significant, while small ones may be.

Outcomes in the Ayres analysis included stop rate, arrest rate, and citation rate by district and race. He also controlled for property and violent crime rate, racial composition of district, age composition, employment measures, poverty measures, property ownership, and marriage status. He produced conditional probabilities of arrest likelihood or citation likelihood (once a stop has occurred). The report calculated conditional frisk likelihood, search likelihood, and requests to exit vehicle, in traffic stops. Ayres also provided a set of hit rate analyses, comparing the probability of weapons, drugs, or any kind of contraband being found by suspect race. The report also analyzed suspect-officer race interaction and considered officer characteristics that correlate with higher black/white disparities.

In 2010, Professor Jeffrey Fagan (Columbia Law School) examined data on all stops in New York from 2004 through 2009. Professor Fagan was the plaintiffs' expert in Floyd v. City of New York, 959 F. Supp. 2d 540 (S. D.N.Y. 2013), where he used a regression technique similar to that used by Ayres. Professor Fagan considered the impact of the racial composition of a district on the likelihood of being stopped, arrested, or issued a citation. Additional outcomes included gun seizure, any weapon seizure, contraband seizure, and whether force was used. Professor Fagan also controlled for various district characteristics, including age composition, racial composition, crime complaints, police patrol strength, a measure of socioeconomic status, population, foreign born population, business district status, and time controls. Another part of the analysis classified stops by type of stop (violent crime, property crime, drug crime) and assessed their legal sufficiency.

III. The Bailey Benchmarks

A. Fourth Amendment Issues

The major question with respect to Fourth Amendment compliance in pedestrian and car stops (and related frisks, searches and/or arrests) is whether the PPD is stopping and frisking suspects with the requisite reasonable suspicion mandated by the Fourth Amendment. To measure compliance, both sides review the 75-48a forms selected by the PPD for analysis (on a random basis and of sufficient number to form statistically significant conclusions) on a quarterly basis.

In each instance, we record whether the stop and/or frisk was justified based on the information provided by the police officer. The standards employed are set forth in the Agreement and applicable court decisions. This analysis provides an important benchmark: if there are a substantial number of stops and/or frisks made without adequate cause, changes in PPD practices will be required to ensure compliance with the Agreement.

We also consider “hit-rates” to help determine whether the PPD is properly stopping and frisking individuals. The ratio of “hits” (i.e., finding of weapons or contraband and/or grounds for an arrest) to the number of stops and frisks provides data this is useful in assessing stop and frisk practices. For example, if weapons or contraband are found in only 1% of the cases in which frisks are conducted, even if those frisks appear to be supported by the officer’s narrative, there is reason to doubt that the predicate suspicion is truly reasonable. We also tabulate cases in which the officer marks “no frisk” in cases in which a frisk was highly likely to have occurred (e.g., stop for a robbery investigation).

B. Fourteenth Amendment Issues: Racial Fairness

The Agreement requires monitoring and analysis with respect to the question of whether race is being impermissibly used as a factor in the decision to stop and frisk. This can be a more difficult issue to analyze than the question of whether the police had reasonable suspicion for the stop or frisk. Thus, even though stop and frisk rates show that minorities are stopped and frisked more frequently than whites does not prove racial bias as non-racial factors may be the causal influences.

We start with a basic analysis, similar to that done by Professor Jones in NAACP v. City of Philadelphia, that compares actual stop and frisk rates by race in a Police Service Area (PSA) to those that would be expected based on census data on the racial composition for that PSA.<sup>1</sup> This provides an overall view of any racial disparities, but does not provide a conclusive answer to the question of possible race bias.

We then employ a multivariate regression analysis. This approach is more robust than a comparison of averages because it examines the relationship among multiple variables simultaneously. To determine the impact of suspect race on the likelihood of a stop or frisk, it is important to control for factors that include the demographic makeup and crime rate of the neighborhood.

Additionally, regression analysis allows for more precise statements about the effects of different variables on outcomes. For example, if a comparison of frisk rates might show that 20% of blacks and 18% of whites are frisked, the key question is whether this is a statistically significant difference.<sup>2</sup> The answer to this question depends on the amount and variability of the data. Regression analysis will provide measures of whether there are statistically significant racial disparities between the stop or the frisk rates of blacks and whites. In the social sciences, the standard significance threshold for the likelihood of finding the same result is 95%.<sup>2</sup> This is the standard we will use in for evaluating the statistical significance of the influence of different characteristics in the regressions.

Since scrutiny of individual 75-48a forms is necessary for some of the Fourth Amendment analysis, we examine a randomly-selected sample of all stops for that portion. Since the necessary data to perform the Fourteenth Amendment analysis is now available electronically, this evaluation does not require sampling – all of the data may be analyzed, thus increasing the accuracy of the analysis.

1. For the following regressions, which are done at the PSA or District level (depending on data available) the dependent variable (the one which is trying to be explained) is number of stops. The independent variables vary for each regression as follows:

- a. Defendant race;
- b. Defendant race, age, sex, Latino status, defendant lives in district;
- c. Defendant race, age, sex, Latino status, defendant lives in district, presence of flash information, presence of a witness;
- d. Defendant race, age, sex, Latino status, defendant lives in district, district racial composition, district income level, district family composition, district age composition, district employment rate, district population;

Since all data comes from stops, these regressions must use data aggregated to the PSA or District level, and the analysis uses the variation of the racial composition of these stops across districts.

The above regressions can be summarized in the following table:

The other outcomes of interest can be analyzed in two ways: by aggregating at the PSA or District level, as well as at the stop-level. Doing the analysis at the stop level can provide greater statistical power to detect differences by race and other characteristics. Thus, all of the following regressions should be done both at the PSA/District and stop-level.

2. The same set of regressions will be used where the dependent variable is whether there was reasonable suspicion for the stop. Since this variable is only available for the sample of the data that has been analyzed for reasonable suspicion, it will contain a smaller number of observations than the regressions described in #1.

3. The same set of regressions will be used where the dependent variable is whether there was a frisk.

4. The same set of regressions will be used where the dependent variable is whether there was reasonable suspicion for a frisk. Since this variable is only available for the sample of the data that has been analyzed for reasonable suspicion, it will contain a smaller number of observations than the regressions described in #1 and #3.

5. The same set of regressions will be used where the dependent variable is whether there was an arrest.

6. The same set of regressions will be used where the dependent variable is whether a citation was issued (vehicles only).

7. The same set of regressions will be used where the dependent variable is whether there was a search of the vehicle (vehicles only).<sup>3</sup>

In addition to the regressions described above, we will focus on particular subsets of the data, such as young males, and we will analyze hit-rates for each type of contraband that is found (e.g., guns, drugs, stolen property).

The purpose of each regression is to assess whether race plays a role in the decision to stop as suspect. The set of regressions begins by examining the role of race in isolation. A number of different control variables are added to the regressions to rule out other potential explanations, such as other defendant characteristics, district characteristics, or enforcement characteristics. For example, if stops are targeted only at youths, and youths tend to be predominantly African-American, a regression that does not control for age would erroneously make it appear that suspect race impacts stop rate. By controlling for age (as in all regressions starting with the second), this explanation may be ruled out. In the same manner, we will attempt to rule out all other plausible explanations for any racial variation in stop rates.

<sup>3</sup> Plaintiffs have focused their reviews thus far on pedestrian stops, but they intend to review vehicle stops as well now that more reliable information is available on these stops in the PPD electronic data base.

The hit-rate analysis is in some ways simpler than the regressions just described, as there is no need to attempt to control for all variables that may impact stops and frisks. The hit-rate approach looks to whether a stop and/or frisk yields contraband or weapons or leads to an arrest. As noted earlier, if an officer properly asserts reasonable suspicion for a frisk (an articulable belief that the suspect is armed and dangerous), we should expect that in a fair number of cases a weapon will be found. If not, there is reason to think that the stop or frisk was not proper. We will also examine the hit-rate by race of the suspect. Thus, for example, if the hit-rates are higher for whites, it may be that officers are using race as an impermissible factor as to who will be stopped or frisked.

In addition, we will also perform the hit-rate analysis at the PSA or District level, including PSA or District racial composition as one of the explanatory variables. This analysis will test for the possibility that stops or frisks may increase at a disproportionate level for all persons in heavily minority neighborhoods. Along these lines, we will also calculate the PSA or District-level stop and frisk rates per reported crimes and analyze whether these ratios are correlated with PSA or District demographics.

Once the regressions have been specified, statistical significance must be re-visited. If the effect of race (its coefficient in the regression) is not statistically significant, it means that the effect of race is lower than the ability of the regression to detect. This is called the power of the regression and the power will be affected by the sample size. If the sample size is chosen appropriately, a statistically insignificant coefficient indicates that the difference by race is statistically indistinguishable from zero (i.e., no race effect).

However, even if the coefficient on race is statistically significant, the magnitude may be so small that it is not meaningful. For example, if blacks are frisked 10% of the time and whites 10.1% of the time, even though the difference might be statistically significant, it is not likely to be of great concern. For evaluating these regression results, a good rule of thumb for a meaningful amount of difference is about 20% of the variable mean. Using the same numbers from the frisk example above, this means that if the frisk rates differed by more than 20% of the 10% frisk rate ( $0.2 * 0.1 = 0.02$  or 2 percent) that would represent a meaningful racial disparity.

Finally, as noted above, plaintiffs intend to review the racial distribution of vehicle stops and will seek to obtain data regarding the race of drivers of vehicles by PSA or District beyond the demographics of the area in which the stop was made. This may be done by random sampling of driver populations or examination of red light camera systems.
